However, the second part of the text appears to be about a specific street in Manhattan, New York City, called 4th Street. It describes the street's location, length, and boundaries, as well as its history and layout. The street has undergone several name changes over time, including from Asylum Street to West 4th Street, due to the demolition of an orphan asylum and subsequent renaming of cross streets. West 4th Street runs north to south through the heart of Greenwich Village in New York City. Its southernmost point intersects with West 12th Street, which spans east to west. The Washington Square Methodist Church is a historic Romanesque Revival building located near Washington Square Park's southwest corner, between MacDougal Street and Sixth Avenue. Constructed between 1859-60, the church was known for supporting anti-war protesters during the Vietnam War era. Later sold in 2005 to be converted into residential units, parts of the church were repurposed into furniture and interior design elements at Urban Spring cafe in Brooklyn. Judson Memorial Church, situated on Thompson Street and Washington Square South, is a notable architectural landmark featuring work by Stanford White and John La Farge. The West Fourth Street subway station serves as a major transfer hub for several subway lines. The street is home to the iconic "Cage" basketball and handball courts, a spot where many of New York's top basketball players have been known to congregate. This area has long been at the forefront of the Village's bohemian lifestyle. Historic spots on West 4th Street include The Mad Hatter tea room, which served as an intellectual meeting ground for artists and thinkers, and the infamous Golden Swan bar, where playwright Eugene O'Neill was a frequent patron. Notable residents have included writers Willa Cather and John Reed, who wrote about the Bolshevik Revolution in his work "Ten Days That Shook the World." The street also hosted Gertrude Vanderbilt Whitney's Whitney Studio Club, which launched the careers of artists like Edward Hopper. This cultural hub continued with the establishment of Gerde's Folk City, a famous folk club where Bob Dylan and Simon & Garfunkel made their New York debuts. Dylan himself lived on West 4th Street from 1962 to 1964 and was inspired by the area, as evidenced in his song "Positively 4th Street." 4th Street in Manhattan: A Hub of History and Music ^ Washington Square South ^ Google Maps ^ Walsh, Kevin (November 1999).
